

Salutations,

As a citizen of the United States of America, a member of the human race-just one of many interdependent species on the planet-in this big, big world, I support this opportunity for the United States of America's Federal Communications Commission to adopt measures to reduce migratory bird collisions at communication towers.

The United States, because of its current position on the world stage, the wealth contained within its borders, and the massive amount of geography it takes up in this hemisphere of North and South America, has a great deal of influence through policy on the well being of species great and small.

I support this move from an older lighting system towards the eventual adoption of a flashing red lighting system. It is one of those amazing times in life where a simple, non-depriving solution has such huge benefits.

If we do not adopt these measures, the purposeless deaths of 4-50 million migratory songbirds annually will no longer just be a tragedy, it will be callous slaughter and that does affect the human environment.

Thank-you,
deborah sam
